BRITISH NEUTRALITY IN CHINA

FRENCH DISSATISFACTION The refusal to allow the French ironclad Triomphante to refit at Hongkong is sharply criticised by some of the Paris papers. The Temps infers that in the English view France and China are regularly at war though without any declaration on either side, and that the rules of neutrals in wars between civilised nations are to be strictly enforced against France. England, in short, treats France and China on exactly the same footing, though Franco has studiously avoided hostilities at treaty ports and has not visited neutral vessels at Formosa, whereas China has been fortifying the mouth of the Shanghai river, profiting by English materials at Shanghai, and despatching munitions by neutrals to Formosa. The Temps doubts, moreover, whether the English officials will prevent English vessels at treaty ports from shipping own ships and fine or imprison the delinquents as provided by the Act of 1870 ?" The constructors of the English navy prefer to strip the ends of the ship of their side plating, in order to get more thickness of armour to protect the magazines, the boilers, and the guns. This difference of opinion is due to a radical divergence of view as to the primary function of iron plating. According to the armoured-enders the first function of iron plating is to keep the ship affoat. Not at all, say their opponents. It was still the fashion for mon of letters to appear before the public in verse, but prose was usurping the place of poetry. Artistic elegance and schotarty form replaced the varied fancy, the exuberant imagination of the alder English school. Poetry subsided into an argumentative, didactic, useful character. It grew classical and courtly, embellished familiar objects and every-day eyents. But it coased to be "intellectual opium eating." It was kept in touch with all the movements of the day-scientific, political, religious, social. And this picture of contemporary life was not conveyed through any literary medium. The generation which placed Roman beroes on the stage in perukes and buckles, or adorned the hand that wrote upon the wall at Belshazzar's feast with ring and ruffle, did not seek the disguise of-classical or medizival costume Its active interests were represented in a simple straightforward style in the ordinary dress of the day.
